Encapsulated Movie Reviews – Four New Indie Titles

March 30th, 2017 by Jason Coleman
 Yet another genre spanning hodgepodge of flicks this week satisfying the movie geek need for smaller film fare. Romance and espionage in the midst of the Cold War, zombies in a strip club, docs on damned jazz trumpeters and terror tales with a demonic slant all make up the films in this weeks edition of Encapsulated Movie Reviews. Check out the critic skinny on Despite The Falling Snow, Peelers, I Called Him Morgan and The Blackcoat's Daughter below!

PEELERS
 (Uncork'd Entertainment)

Peelers is a throwback to those non-politically correct genre flicks one might expect from the more loose times like the 80's and as such will definitely turn off those viewers with a more precious cinematic sensibility. But tackling the film from such an unapologetic out there perspective I'd have to say that Peelers is one damn entertaining film - a dirty undead style fun flick set in a strip club that delivers on all it's uncouth promises. It's got gore (it's a black sludge that starts the undead character carnage - and it's gross!), girls (the sin and skin is on full display in this club!) and gratuitous bits (all the bathroom scenes are fully vomit inducing!) that will either make you shake your head or jump for joy. Plus with a baseball swinging lead heroine named Blue Jean Douglas (wonder woman Wren Walker!) who not only kicks serious ass, but bares all in the films final comical scene, Peelers pays homage to past picture depravity and pays off.
